documentary that follows David Lavallee's three-year journey from the Columbia

Icefields to the end of the Athabasca River. The DVD details many far-reaching ramifications of Alberta's oil sands developments. As a mountaineer and hiking guide, David is in search of answers about the battle between water and oil. He has noticed profound changes in the mountains: climate change is rendering these landscapes unrecognizable.

“White Water, Black Gold” is a sober look at the untold costs (to water, wildlife and people) associated with developing the second largest deposit of “oil” in the world. The DVD ends optimistically with a discussion of possible alternatives to oil.
